

ABSTRACT

A method for estimating a response time by combining metrics from networking and application layers. This is achieved by placing correlation tags in data collected at these layers so that the data can later be identified as corresponding to a single web page download or a web session. Once data corresponding to a single web page download or a web session is identified, a splicing algorithm calculates client perceived response time by using analytical models of response time.